The existing system, according to the ption and Children Bill, is such that only married couples and single people uding gay people) can adopt. However, the New Labor government has been be to amend this by extending the right to gay couples. The Health Secretary, Milburn, suggested that all unmarried couples should be allowed to apply adoption, providing they were over 21 and could prove that they were in a -term relationship that would provide financial and practical security for a 1. In May 2002, this amendment was passed through the House of Commons to a vote of 301 against 174. However, when it reached the House of Lords in ober 2002, the amendment was overturned by a free vote of 196 to 162. This ctively means that the law cannot be changed, even if ministers in the ernment support it. Many Conservative politicians have spoken out against amendment, however, emphasizing traditional family values. For example, Widdecombe and Earl Howe have claimed that only a married couple can wide the stability and security needed by children who have suffered a matic upbringing. On the other hand, gay activists and human rights paigners such as Peter Tatchell have argued that same sex couples are ally capable of loving and caring for a child in a secure family home. They say there are plenty of children living in institutions and waiting to be adopted, bureaucracy and prejudicial discrimination are preventing this from pening. o you think that unmarried and gay couples can provide as stable and secure mily home as married couples? What kind of image of childhood is presented here? Ww is the Conservative ideology of 'traditional family values' reflected in this pount of marriage?	20
